Lawyers are being tapped as college and university presidents at a rapidly growing pace. While the pathways to the presidency may be varied, one commonality with the majority of these lawyer presidents is that they have at some point in their careers been government lawyers at the federal, state and/or local levels. This webinar is a moderated discussion with three such lawyer presidents, two who had different federal government experience and one who worked at the local government level as well as with the military. This interactive panel will explore the skills government lawyers develop and how that prepares one to lead in higher education. Government lawyers and lawyers who represent government and who have higher education clients, as well as lawyers in general considering future career options, will benefit from listening in.
